What do you think is the ideal material for orbital rim implants? I dont want to be walking around with some plastic feeling stuff in my face, ideally it should be highly functional and as similar to bone as possible, and able to take a punch properly

How about HA paste?

The picture you posted seems to be trying very hard to sell Mersilene, yet very few surgeons use it. Its hard to create precise shapes with it, which to me automatically rules it out.

Gore-tex is shit.

Honestly, a lot of people are misinformed about what infraorbital implants do. All they do is eliminate hollowing and dark bags, which can also be accomplished with fillers. They won't effect your eye shape at all, nor will they reduce scleral show.

Can you just, like stop posting or something? Honestly do you really think i'm considering an invaisve plastic surgery without even knowing what its about?

You clearly have no idea what you're talking about. The only reason you should get infraorbital implants is if your midface is already being opened up for another procedure. Just get fillers and you won't have to worry about your eye falling out due to an infection or the implant dislodging and stabbing your eye.

Medpor. It's the material of choice offered by reputable infraorbital rim implant surgeons.

HA Paste is the best..as it will be part of your bone.
Medpor is used a lot, better than silicone

Fat Graft...works well also, thats's what I'll do in few months.
fillers are okay but temporary.

Looking to get IOIs as well. Eye area makes me puke under overhead light, and in normal its just meh. Thinking about combining IOIs and an avocado eye shape surgery, while lifting the upper eyelid up cuz its droopy. Then after all of that Im left with close set eyes (which after surgery will hopefully appear horizontally longer) and a long face. Next up, LF1 impaction to shorten the midface.

GI with your IOIs.
